In a story from Plato's dialogue, "The Symposium", Aristophanes, a comic playwright, explains that humans were originally created with four arms, four legs, and a single head with two faces. There were three genders: male, female, and androgynous (a combination of both male and female). These beings were powerful and even threatened the gods.

To diminish their power, Zeus decided to split them in half, resulting in the humans we are today, each with two arms, two legs, and one face. This separation left humans longing for their other half, their soulmate, to feel whole again.

Love as a search for completeness and unity – "Looking for Yourself".
